The cell, equilibrium is supposed to be disturbed by injury to any of the physiological atom-groups as by a toxin, and this disturbance results in an effort at compensatory repair during which plastic material in excess of the amount required is generated and finds its way into the blood. This Ehrlich regards as the antitoxin which is capable of neutralizing the particular toxin to which it owes its origin, if this is subsequently introduced into the blood. In this theory a specific combining relation is assumed to exist between various toxic substances and the secondary atom-groups of certain cellular elements of the body. The atom-groups which, in accordance with this theory, combine with the toxin of any particular disease-germ Ehrlich calls the toxiphoric side-chain. 1. theory of, Emmerich and Löw's, based upon the conclusion that many bacteria generate enzymes capable of digesting the organism by which they were generated and sometimes other organisms as well. 2. theory of, exhaustion hypothesis, Pasteur's theory that immunity often afforded to the tissues by an attack of infection or following vaccination against infection is due to an abstraction from the tissues by the organism concerned in the primary attack of something necessary to the growth of the infecting organism. insanity (in-san'-it-e) [see insane]. A derangement of the mental faculties, with or without loss of volition and of consciousness. Insanity may be due to defective development, to acquired disease, or to natural decay. It is characterized, according to its form, by a variety of symptoms, the most common of which are change of character and habits, moroseness, confusion, elation, melancholia, mania, delusions, and hallucinations. Melancholia, mania, delusional insanity, and dementia are the four principal types of the affection. i., acquired, that arising after a long period of life of mental integrity. i., affective, a form affecting only the emotions, as melancholia. i., alcoholic, that induced by alcoholic excess, usually a result of hereditary tendencies. i., alternating. See i., circular. i., anemic, that due to anemia. i., arthritic, that due to rheumatism or gout. i., circular, a form of insanity recurring in cycles varying in length from a few days to many months. The arrangement of the cycle varies in different individuals, but is constant in a given case. Thus melancholia may be followed by mania, and this by a lucid interval, the passage from one mental condition to the other being abrupt or gradual. NUCLEAR AND CELL DIVISION. SEMI DIAGRAMMATIC. (Steens.)

a. Resting cell ready to begin division; b, the nuclear reticulum is assuming the form of a thickened thread, and the cytoplasm at opposite poles is becoming thread-like to form the spindle fibers; c, the nuclear thread has divided longitudinally through the middle, and the spindle fibers have become more definite; d, the nuclear membrane and the nucleolus have disappeared, and the nuclear thread has become segmented into chromosomes which are assembling at the equator of the cell. All of the phases of division thus far are called prophase. e, the metaphase, where the longitudinal halves of the chromosomes are being drawn apart preparatory to their journey toward the opposite poles, f, the anaphase, or movement of the chromosomes toward the poles, is about completed, connecting fibers extend from pole to pole; g, telophase where the chromosomes have begun to spin out in the form of a nuclear reticulum. The connecting fibers have begun to thicken in the equatorial plane; h, the connecting fibers have spread out and come into contact with the wall of the mother cell in the equatorial plane, and the thickening of the fibers throughout this plane has made a complete cell plate within which the dividing wall will be produced, i, a nuclear membrane has been formed about each daughter nucleus, and the dividing cell-wall is completed. The two daughter cells are now ready to grow to the size of the parent cell in a, when the daughter nuclei will appear as does the nucleus there. All highly magnified.

Their average diameter is 0 or mm. ($\frac{1}{100}$ inch). In normal blood several forms are distinguished: lymphocytes, large uninuclear leukocytes, transitional forms, and multinuclear cells; according to the granules contained in their protoplasm, three varieties are described—the neutrophil, the eosinophil, and the basophil. 1.s, Ehrlich's theory concerning, all varieties may be classed into two groups having separate origins, functions, and relations. The first group would comprise all lymphocytes, which are produced solely by the lymphatic tissues; and the second, the mononuclear leukocytes and transitional forms, the polynuclear neutrophils, the eosinophils, and the basophils, all of which cells are produced exclusively by the marrow. 1., polymorphonucleic, 1., polynuclearneutrophilic, one derived primarily from lymphocytes and secondarily from a myelocyte; originating in red bone-marrow, in the lymph-glands, or spleen. 1.s, polymorphous, 1.s, polynuclear, cells in which the nucleus is either lobed or made up of several portions united by such delicate nuclear filaments as to give the impression of a multinucleated cell in distinction to mononuclear, eosinophil, and neutrophil leukocytes and lymphocytes. 1., Uskow's theory concerning, all leukocytes except the basophilic cells are but different developmental stages of the same cell. The youngest form of leukocyte, the small lymphocyte, originates in the lymph-glands, the lymphocytic bone-marrow, and the spleen.

The paroxysms may be intermittent, remittent, or irregular. If repeated daily, the fever is designated quotidian; if on alternate days, tertian; if with an interval of two days, quartan. If two paroxysms occur daily, the fever is designated a double quotidian. There may be a tertian form, a paroxysm occurring daily, but only those of alternate days being alike; a double quartan form, and others. A typical malarial paroxysm consists of a cold stage, a hot stage, and a sweating stage, occurring in the sequence given. Intermittent fever is characterized by the occurrence of a complete intermission of the symptoms in the interval between two paroxysms, the temperature becoming normal or subnormal. In remittent fever there is only an amelioration of the symptoms in the intervals. In certain localities in which the malarial organisms are exceedingly numerous or intensely virulent the attack displays a pernicious tendency. Of this type there may be a cerebral form, characterized either by delirium and excitement or by coma and depression; a thoracic form, in which the respiration is accelerated and there is an urgent sense of the need of air; a gastrointestinal form, attended with nausea, vomiting, jaundice, and diarrhea; or an asthenic or algid form, in which there is a condition of marked debility with a striking coldness of the surface and of the breath. To the irregular manifestations of malarial poisoning, which do not at any time present the classic association of chill, fever, and sweat, the designation of "dumb ague" is given. The enlargement of the spleen in chronic malaria is sometimes designated "ague-cake." - mercury (mer'-kū-re) [Mercurius, a Latin divinity, the god of traffic]. Symbol Hg; atomic weight 200; quantivalence II. Hydrargyrum. A shining, silver-white, liquid, volatile metal, having a specific gravity of 13.55. It is insoluble in the ordinary solvents, in hydrochloric acid, and in sulphuric acid in the cold; it dissolves in the last when boiled with it, and is readily soluble in nitric acid. It boils at 357 25° C., and solidifies at -39.4° C. Mercury is found pure, but is chiefly obtained as the native sulphide, or cinnabar. It forms two classes of compounds—the mercurous, those in which two atoms of the metal, and the mercuric, those in which one atom, is combined with a bivalent radical. The mercuric salts are more soluble and more poisonous than the mercurous. The uses of mercury and its salts are as follows: as a purgative and cholagogue (calomel, blue-mass, mercury with chalk), as an alterative in chronic inflammations, as an antisyphilitic, an antiphlogistic, an intestinal antiseptic, a disinfectant, a parasiticide, a caustic, and an astringent. The absorption of mercury in sufficient quantity causes poisoning, characterized by a coppery taste in the mouth, pytalism, loosening of the teeth, sponginess of the gums; in severer cases, ulceration of the cheeks, necrosis of the jaws, marked emaciation; at time neuritis develops, and a peculiar tremor. The soluble salts when taken in excess act as intense gastrointestinal irritants. m. albuminate, dry, a compound of albumin with 4% of mercury bichloride; a white powder, soluble in water with turbidity. Pertaining to the system of weights and measures, of which the meter is the basis. m. system, a decimal system of weights and measures employed in France, Germany, and other countries, and used generally in the sciences. The standard is the meter, the ten-millionth part of the distance from the equator to the north pole. The actual standard unit is the distance between two lines on a platinum-iridium rod preserved in the archives of the International Metric Commission at Paris, and is equivalent to 39.37079 inches; in the United States the length of the meter is assumed as 39.37 inches. The standard of capacity is the liter, a cubic volume of meter in each dimension. The standard of weight is the gram, the weight of $\frac{1}{1000}$ liter (one cubic centimeter) of distilled water at its maximum density. As the unit of microscopic measurement the thousandth part of a millimeter has been adopted. It is called micromillimeter, or micron; its symbol is μ . The multiples in the metric system are expressed by the prefixes deca, hecto, and kilo; the subdivisions by the prefixes deci, centi, and milli.

10	grams	= 1 decagram.
.1	gram	= 1 decigram.
.01	gram	= 1 centigram.
.001	gram	= 1 milligram.

In common practice, however, the following divisions only are used, the others being expressed in figures.

10 millimeters	= 1 centimeter.
100 centimeters	= 1 meter.
1000 meters	= 1 kilometer.
1000 cubic centimeters	= 1 liter.

1000 milligrams	= 1 gram.

The following are the equivalent values:

1 meter	= 39.37 inches.
1 liter	= 1 quart $\frac{1}{4}$ gill, U. S. measure
1 gram	= 15.43 grains.
1 minim	= 0.061 cubic centimeter.

TABLE OF ENDOCARDIAL MURMURS

Time	Point of Maximum Intensity	Line of Conduction	Lesson	Quality
Systolic.	Center of mitral area, above and to left of apex.	At sixth rib opposite apex, a line drawn from the anterior fold of axilla to lower angle of left scapula.	Mitral insufficiency or incompetence.	Variable, usually soft, blowing, may be distinctly musical.
Systolic.	Midsternum or to right of it, opposite third rib or second interspace	Toward top of sternum, and along aorta and its large branches.	Aortic obstruction	Usually loud and harsh. Harshness is one of its distinguishing characteristics.
Diastolic.	Midsternum opposite upper border of cartilage of third rib.	Down sternum to ensiform cartilage.	Aortic insufficiency or incompetence.	Soft, blowing, sometimes rough, frequently musical. It has the greatest area of diffusion of all the cardiac murmurs
Presystolic.	Over mitral area around the apex.	Usually not transmitted	Mitral obstruction.	Generally low-pitched, rough, churning, grinding, or blubbery. Subject to great variation of pitch and quality.
Systolic.	Midsternum just above the ensiform cartilage.	Toward the epigastrium.	Tricuspid insufficiency or incompetence.	Low-pitched, superficial, blowing, soft, faint.
Presystolic	Midsternum opposite the cartilage of fourth rib.	Not transmitted.	Tricuspid obstruction.	Undetermined.
Systolic.	Second interspace to the left of sternum or at the level of third rib.	Upward a short distance and to left of sternum, stopping abruptly.	Pulmonary obstruction.	Often harsh and audible over the whole precordia, may be very faint.
Diastolic.	Second left interspace	Down left edge of sternum to ensiform cartilage.	Pulmonary insufficiency or incompetence.	Soft and blowing.

systole and diastole respectively. See table of murmurs on this page. m., cardiopulmonary, one produced by the impact of the heart against the lung. m., diastolic, a cardiac murmur occurring during the diastole. m., direct, a murmur produced by obstruction to the blood-current as it is passing in its normal direction. m., Duroziez's, the double murmur sometimes heard in the femoral artery in aortic regurgitation. m., dynamic, one resulting from tumultuous and irregular action of the heart. m., endocardial, a murmur produced within the cavities of the heart. (See table below.) m., exocardial, a murmur connected with the heart, but produced outside of its cavities. m., Flint's, a murmur sometimes heard at the apex of the heart in aortic regurgitation. It is generally presystolic in time, and is probably due to the fact that on account of the extreme ventricular dilatation the valves cannot be forced back against the walls and produce a relative narrowing of the auriculoventricular orifice. m., friction-, a sound produced by the rubbing of two inflamed serous surfaces upon each other. m., functional, a cardiac murmur occurring from excited action of the heart or anemic condition of the individual, without any structural change in the valves or orifices. m., hemic, a sound believed to be due to changes in the quality or amount of the blood and not to lesions of the vessels or valves. It is heard especially in anemic conditions. m. indirect, one produced by the blood flowing in a direction contrary to the normal current. m., inorganic, a murmur not due to valvular lesions; a hemic or a functional murmur. m., mitral, one produced at the mitral orifice. m., muscular. 1. The sound heard on auscultation of a contracting muscle. 2. See myesthesia. m., system, the muscles of the body taken together. m., tissue, the tissue of which muscles are composed; it is of two principal varieties—the striped, striated, or voluntary, and the unstriped, nonstriated, or involuntary muscular tissue. The striped muscular tissue is composed of muscle-fibers, the unstriped of elongated, spindle-shaped cells. A muscle-fiber consists of sarcolemma, muscle-nuclei, and muscle-substance. The sarcolemma is an elastic, homogeneous, connective-tissue sheath which lightly invests the muscle-fiber. The nuclei are fusiform in shape, are situated immediately beneath the sarcolemma, and run parallel with the axis of the fiber. The muscle-fiber itself consists of two substances—a dark, doubly refracting, or anisotropic contractile substance, and a lighter, semifluid, isotropic substance termed sarcoplasm. The contractile substance consists of delicate spindles, the apposition of the thicker portions of which produces the dark transverse disc. The spindles terminate in minute beads, the juxtaposition of which gives rise to the intermediate disc or membrane of Krause. The neutral sarcoplasm fills out the spaces left between the spindles, and, as ordinarily the tapering ends of the spindles are too delicate to be seen, the space between the intermediate and transverse discs—the lateral disc—looks homogeneous. The contractile fibrils into which the contractile substance is divided, formed by the end-to-end union of the spindles, are aggregated into bundles—the muscle-columns—surrounded by a layer of sarcolemma. On transverse section these muscle columns give rise to the appearance known as Cohnheim's fields. The muscle-fibers are held together by delicate areolar tissue—the endomysium. Several grouped together form a primary bundle, which is surrounded by a sheath termed the perimysium. Fasciculi are aggregations of primary bundles, and are the units of which the complete muscle is composed, the latter being surrounded by the epimysium. m.-tone. Stillman's, for hemorrhoids; the patient is placed in the knee-chest position and each mass is reduced by manipulation as for hernia, after which a pie-bougie is introduced.
- Steinach's, ligation of the vas deferens for the alleged purpose of rejuvenating the patient. Stimson's, for fracture of the patella; four small punctures are made deeply through the skin at the margin of the patella, at equal distances from it, 'O'. A half-curved Hagedorn needle armed with a heavy silk suture is carried in one lower incision, through the ligamentum patellæ, and out the opposite incision, reëntered at the point of exit and brought out at the upper incision on the same side, inserted again at the same point, made to transfix the quadriceps tendon and emerge at the other upper incision, introduced again at the same point and brought out at the place of starting. The fragments are held together by strong tenacula and the sutures tied tightly and the ends cut short; the incisions are then closed. Stokes' (Sir W.): 1. For amputation above the knee; the same as Griffith's operation, except that section of the femur is made above the condyles. 2. For excision of the tongue; a modification of Jaeger's operation. 3. For flat-foot; by removing a wedge-shaped piece of bone from the head and neck of the astragalus. 4. For single hare-lip; the prolabium is formed by tissue from both sides of the cleft by means of incisions skirting the red margin; the upper part of the cleft is completely pared and the partially dissected flaps turned back, while the edges of the skin are brought together and the prolabial flaps drawn downward and outward.

Stoltz's, for cystocele; it is also called the purse-string and tobacco-pouch operation; denuding a circular patch on the anterior vaginal wall, and running a suture around the margin and tying.
